

CHILDREN AND MONEY

A Man's responsibility to his children is not to lead them to live a life of idleness, but rather to equip him to live a life of service. Money is only a certificate that represents service. When a man performs a service, he should receive the appropriate amount of money. When a man has a service done for him, he should pay the proper amount of money representing the value of the service performed. Hence, basically money is simply compensation for services rendered over a period.

It represents the amount and quality of work or service performed over a given.

No child can develop good character unless he or she has the proper attitude toward money. Several lessons must be learned if this attitude is to be developed.

Questions for discussion:

1. Is money important to you?
2. Do you consider money as a basic need?
3. If your child accomplished or achieved something, did you reward them with money?
4. Do you believe that money is the root of all evil? Why or why not?
5. If you were the richest person in the world, how would you spend your money?
